Lessons in Politeness.

The late Professor Morren related once in our hearing a rebuke which he gave to a high-strung Beacon Hill dansel, which is worth repeating for the moral it carries, says the Boston Courier. The young lady was one of his pupils and made herself particularly obnoxious by her haughty and even insolent bearing, displaying her contempt for all about her so markedly that it became at last

"I knew her mother in France," said the Professor, whose broken English there is no need of producing here, "and she was a most exquisitely modest and unassuming woman. But the daughter was so insolent that she had to have a esson; so I said to her:

"Will you be so good as to remain after the lesson? I have something to
